

ABOUT RESPONSIBLE S.A.C.S.

Self Actualized Creative Sexuality is more than a fancy term for fucking on your own terms. Before the term “self actualized” undergoes trendoid mutation, acquiring progressive layers of ambiguity through erroneous simplification into obscurity, I’d like to declare what it means in the context of sexuality. Self actualization is the process of accepting that all human behavior is motivated by a need to validate and reinforce core values in ways that fulfill our deepest, most private, personal primal desires and seeking to structure your human relations to accommodate this belief. One does not suddenly awake one morning self actualized, nor is it something you suddenly realize you must be. Rather, self actualization is a process, a dedication, a perception pursued like Buddhism, as a lifetime practice, learned and refined from the lessons life gives you. Understanding your core beliefs through your personal sexuality is for most, perhaps all, where self actualization begins.

Sex is the pointy end of human relations, literally and figuratively. As a species we are hardwired not only to focus resources toward reproductive opportunity, but to do so with such diligence and complexity that sexual rights and privileges form the basis of human social contract. Through all the convolutions of human history our society has been left with a Sex Contract little removed from that formed spontaneously by Ogg and Oggette way back when. The wording we use to define “child-carrier will add skill, strength and ingenuity to product and spear-carrier will provide product to make Safety” has become more complex, allusive and specialized as have we but the purpose of the agreement has not. Our current culture’s version of the Sex Contract is an absolute reflection of our values, as have been all versions before ours. Sex today is expected to be either a commodity-based exchange (either straight business or some adaptation of Buythecow/Securethering Picketfenceness) or a self-gratifying exercise in establishing status and control. Sexual congress has come to be viewed, as have all of human relations as a zero sum game.

To be self actualized sexually is to transcend current culture’s convention and view sex as Art not Commerce: art that is created from nothing and from everything, art that is an expression of the coalescence of the passion, the beauty and the heart of the contributors, a melding of intents and essences, the sum exceeding the parts yet still invigorating rather than diminishing them. Directing repressed sexual tension into understanding how to meet your genuine, legitimate, personal needs rather than into more fashionable substitution behavior like violence, neglect and substance abuse leaves one with more time, money and generally better able to pursue better living.

For Smart Fun

Stepping beyond convention is not encouraged by any culture, for those that dare the benefits expand as they diverge. It is a simple but difficult thing; all it takes is absolute self-honesty and a commitment to your own beliefs that allows them to determine your choices. Hard skills need to be learned like real communication, reasonable expectation, patience, perseverance and taking responsibility for actions, their consequences and ramifications. These skills and many other useful inputs in pursuit of self actualization are phenomenally easier to deal with in sexual context. The homework is fun though, and the benefit expands into the fullness of your life ultimately gaining self generated momentum.

Creativity in sexuality is not limited to the self actualized variety, nor does self actualized sex need to be at all creative. The realm of SAS however is the tropical paradise for creativity. There is no other human endeavor that equals the Artistic expression of individuals intent on mutually exploiting every aspect of “feeling”. In a self actualized creative sexual endeavor the creative energy goes back into this Art of feeling to benefit all rather than being pulled from other participants to benefit the creative one. For many striving toward self actualization who are creative, uninhibited sexual expression is their favorite and most efficace tool. Self Actualized Creative Sexuality, or SACS as we would like it to become known, is a purpose built vehicle you create for yourself to shield and transport you through the inroads of your primal desires. Individual landscapes vary, as do transport, comfort and security concerns but journeys inevitably intersect and coincide. This is good because sexual exploration is invalid within a sampling of one.

To avoid loosing direction in the realm of SACS one must accept that all you meet should be judged not by their position or direction in the realm but by their awareness of their position and direction. Their compatibility with you, not their character, is measured by their position and direction. When all is challenge and the truth is often under the strangest mushroom, appearances can be deceptive. The specific thing that separates those involved in SACS from selfish pricks, thoughtless bitches and other relatives in the asshole family is that in SACS all participants gain in the interaction or the model doesn't work. Responsible SACS means being clear and forthcoming about goals, limits and guarantees required and given, it also means being honest about competence, experience, desire and dedication. Misrepresentation and delusion distort the magic either shutting it off or taking it off course, often to ill effect.

Responsible SACS could be the new in-phrase that you chirp for your cohorts' approval in Netland or the vehicle by which you find joyous empowerment. It could be a cute way to refer to what you've done your whole life or a new way to describe what losers do. Here at Smart Fetish, responsible SACS is what we recommend to all those that are ready, willing and able, as the best way there is to have fun while living well.
